

Helping customers make informed decisions at Bolton's Purple Haze are Boris Pavlovic, Iain Wight, owner Ron McCarthy and Dave Ramage.

Customer satisfaction is their priority tattooists were artists and after showing them examples of their work, they are now classified as artists for the purpose of work visas.

Through word of mouth, the business has done well and McCarthy has also opened an outlet on Queen Street, selling clothing, jewellery, accessories, etc. Some of the work that has kept them busy includes revamping old, faded tattoos, correcting mistakes and cover-ups.

McCarthy pointed out that bad tattoo artists give tattoos a bad name. He's in it for the long-term and customer satisfaction is their number-one priority.

Popular locations for tattoos for men these days are the shoulders, arms, backs and chests. For younger women it tends to be the lower backs.

His artists have their own styles - Dave is a pen and paper kind of guy, and Boris is an excellent graphic artist with a flair for computer-assisted designs. The going rate at Purple Haze is $120 per hour, but each tattoo has to be evaluated individually. The factors linked to cost are size and intricacy. For the larger, more complicated designs, customers have to make three or four visits.

McCarthy also prides himself on the cleanliness of the shop - every area and room is well above standards and exceeds all health department guidelines.

Piercings are handled by Iain Wight, who is meticulous about his craft, taking time to explain everything to his customers. The needles are pre-sterilized and he sterilizes and pre-packages the jewellery in individually wrapped bags. He puts his clients at ease and describes everything in detail to them as he goes through the process. He also provides pamphlets about hygiene and care. He has dissuaded some customers from certain piercings.

Most common today, he said, are navels and nostrils. They welcome customers to call them after the piercing with any questions or concerns.

Body art is a personal, long-term investment. Make a wise decision, and let the staff at Purple Haze help you make the most of it.
